Trial Date: October 4, 2011
The Honorable James V. Selna

1 TO ALL PARTIES AND THEIR COUNSEL OF RECORD:

2 PLEASE TAKE NOTICE THAT on March 21, 2011, at 8:00 a.m., or as soon
3 thereafter as the matter may be heard, in the courtroom of the Honorable James V.
4 Selna, United States District Judge, located at 411 West Fourth Street, Santa Ana, 5 California, Defendants Stuart Carson, Hong “Rose” Carson, Paul Cosgrove, and David 6 Edmonds (collectively “Defendants”) will and hereby do move this Court for an order 7 dismissing Counts One through Ten of the Indictment.

8 The basis for Defendants’ Motion is that Counts Two through Ten – the 9 substantive FCPA counts – fail to state an offense. First, as a matter of statutory 10 interpretation, the employees of the state-owned companies identified in the Indictment 11 – i.e., the supposed recipients of the alleged bribes – fall beyond the scope of the 12 FCPA’s definition of “foreign official.” Second, to the extent that there is any 13 ambiguity in the statute, it must be resolved in Defendants’ favor through application 14 of the well-established rule of lenity. Third, in the alternative, to the extent that the 15 FCPA can be construed to proscribe payments made or promised to employees of 16 state-owned companies, the statute is unconstitutionally vague as applied to 17 Defendants. For these reasons, Counts Two through Ten fail to state an offense and 18 should be dismissed. Because Count One – the conspiracy count, which alleges a 19 conspiracy to violate the FCPA and the Travel Act – alleges that Defendants conspired 20 to violate the FCPA by bribing these non-foreign officials, that count also must be 21 dismissed because the grand jury may not have indicted Defendants for conspiracy in 22 the absence of the (legally defective) FCPA allegations.

2 Authorities filed in support thereof, the Declaration of Professor Michael J. Koehler, 3 the Declaration of Nicola T. Hanna, the Indictment, and such other and further 4 argument and evidence as may be presented to the Court at the hearing of this matter.

I. INTRODUCTION..... 1

II. OVERVIEW OF ARGUMENT..... 1

III. LEGAL STANDARD..... 4

IV. ARGUMENT..... 6

 A. The FCPA Does Not Apply To The Conduct Charged In The Indictment Because, As A Matter Of Law, The Officers And Employees Of State-Owned Companies Are Not “Foreign Officials.” 6

 1. The Ordinary Meaning Of The Term “Instrumentality”
 As Used In The FCPA Does Not Encompass State-Owned Business Enterprises..... 11

 a. Under The Doctrine Of Noscitur A Sociis, The Term “Instrumentality” Must Be Construed In Relation To The Terms That Precede It. 12

 b. Officers And Employees Of State-Owned Companies Could Not Reasonably Be Called “Officials” Of A Foreign Government..... 15

 c. Other Provisions Of The FCPA Make Clear That The Term “Instrumentality” As Used In The FCPA
 Does Not Include State-Owned Business
 Enterprises. 16

 2. The Government’s Proposed Interpretation Would Lead
 To Absurd Results. 19

 3. The Legislative History Of The FCPA Demonstrates That Congress Did Not Intend To Include Employees Of State-Owned Business Enterprises Within The Meaning Of “Foreign Official.” 21

4. Where Congress Wants To Define “Instrumentality” To Include State-Owned Enterprises, It Knows How To Do So. 30

5. The Government’s Proposed Interpretation Would Render The Statute Unconstitutionally Vague As Applied To Defendants. 33

B. Unless The Government’s Interpretation Is “Unambiguously Correct,” Application Of The Rule Of Lenity Requires Dismissal Of Counts One Through Ten Of The Indictment. 35

C. In The Alternative, If The Government’s Interpretation Of “Instrumentality” Is Correct, Then The Statute Is Unconstitutionally Vague As Applied To Defendants. 39

1 MEMORANDUM OF POINTS AND AUTHORITIES

2 I. INTRODUCTION

3 The Indictment in this Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (“FCPA” or “the Act”) 4 case does not allege that the Defendants bribed foreign presidents, prime ministers, or 5 princes – or any other foreign officials working within the executive, legislative, or 6 judicial branches of their governments. Rather, Counts Two through Ten of the 7 Indictment (the substantive FCPA counts) allege only that the Defendants made 8 corrupt payments to officers and employees of “state owned” companies – specifically, 9 those companies’ “Vice Presidents, Engineering Managers, General Managers, 10 Procurement Managers, and Purchasing Officers.” Indictment, ¶ 12. But employees of 11 these business enterprises are not “foreign officials” within the meaning of the FCPA, 12 even if the Court accepts as true that the enterprises are “state owned.” Accordingly, 13 Counts Two through Ten of the Indictment fail as a matter of law and must be 14 dismissed. Additionally, Count One fails and must be dismissed because it alleges a 15 conspiracy to violate the FCPA by bribing these non-foreign officials, and these legally 16 defective allegations infect the entire count.

17 II. OVERVIEW OF ARGUMENT

18 The anti-bribery provisions of the FCPA prohibit corrupt payments to “foreign 19 official[s]” for the purpose of obtaining or retaining business. A “foreign official,” 20 however, is not any foreign national. Rather, under the FCPA, a “foreign official” is 21 expressly and narrowly defined as an “officer or employee of a foreign government or 22 any department, agency, or instrumentality thereof.” The Government’s theory in the 23 present case rests entirely on the unsupported assumption that state-owned companies 24 are “instrumentalities” of foreign governments, and that their employees (even low-25 level ones) are therefore “foreign officials” within the meaning of the Act. The 26 Government’s sweeping and aggressive interpretation is wrong as a matter of law.

27 As explained in detail below, the Government’s theory (i) has no basis in the 28 explicit text of the statute, (ii) has no support in the statute’s legislative history, and

1 (iii) has never been endorsed by a court that comprehensively has considered the issue 2 (including a full consideration of the FCPA's extensive legislative history). Thus, in 3 bringing this case, the prosecution has stretched the FCPA well beyond its clear textual 4 and intended boundaries and, by so doing, seeks to sweep within its reach conduct that 5 Congress simply has not criminalized. The Court should reject the Government's 6 attempt to redraw the lines after the fact. If the Government wants to pursue FCPA 7 prosecutions for alleged bribes made to employees of state-owned business enterprises, 8 it should lobby Congress – not the courts – to criminalize such conduct under the 9 FCPA.

10 The term “instrumentality” is not defined in the Act, but basic canons of 11 statutory construction make clear that the term does not encompass state-owned 12 business enterprises:

13 First, in the absence of an express definition, the Court must give the term its 14 ordinary meaning as used in the statute. As used in the FCPA, the term 15 “instrumentality” refers to a governmental unit or subdivision that is akin to a 16 “department” or an “agency,” the two terms that precede it in the statute. Thus, the 17 term covers governmental boards, bureaus, commissions, and other department-like 18 and agency-like governmental entities. The definition does not extend, however, to 19 entities in which a government merely has a monetary investment (i.e., state-owned 20 business enterprises), because such a definition would make the term fundamentally 21 different than the terms that precede it. This conclusion is bolstered by the statute's 22 use of the term “foreign official,” which suggests a traditional government employee, 23 as well as by language in other portions of the FCPA.

24 Second, the Government's proposed interpretation would lead to absurd results.
25 Among other things, if it were adopted, the Government's definition would transform 26 persons no one would consider to be foreign government employees – including but 27 not limited to U.S. citizens working in the United States for companies that have some 28 component of foreign ownership – into “foreign officials.” Additionally, in certain

1 countries where state-owned businesses are the norm, the majority of employed 2 individuals would be “foreign officials.”

3 Third, the extensive legislative history of the FCPA makes clear that Congress 4 did not intend the statute to cover payments made to employees of state-owned 5 business enterprises. Rather, the FCPA was aimed at preventing the special harm 6 posed by the bribery of foreign government officials.

7 Fourth, as other statutes and proposed legislation make clear, Congress knows 8 how to define the term “instrumentality” in terms of government ownership of a 9 commercial enterprise where it desires to do so. But it did not do so in the FCPA.

10 Fifth, in construing statutes, courts should avoid interpretations resulting in 11 unconstitutional vagueness. Adopting the Government’s amorphous and expansive 12 interpretation of “instrumentality” here would result in exactly the type of 13 unconstitutional vagueness that must be avoided. The reason is simple: The 14 Government has never explained with any clarity what constitutes a “state-owned” 15 business in the context of the FCPA. Is a minority investment by a foreign 16 government enough? Is a majority investment required? Must the state direct the 17 majority of voting rights? Is there a required element of control? Does the purpose or 18 type of commercial enterprise matter? Could a subsidiary of a state-owned business 19 qualify? Without a clear demarcation, especially in an era of large-scale government 20 investments and bailouts of traditional private enterprises, the FCPA’s reach, under the 21 Government’s theory, would be whatever the prosecution says it is in any given case.
22 Accordingly, the Court must construe the FCPA’s instrumentality provision narrowly 23 to mean traditional government officials, and not employees of a state-owned 24 (whatever that means) commercial business.

25 Even if the Court does not conclude that the term “instrumentality” should be 26 construed to refer only to a governmental entity that is innately governmental such as a 27 department or an agency, there are two other grounds on which the Court can and 28 should dismiss Counts One through Ten of the Indictment. First, unless the Court

1 concludes, after exhausting the canons of statutory construction, that the Government’s 2 proposed construction is “unambiguously correct,” the Court is required to adopt the 3 Defendants’ construction under the well-established rule of lenity. United States v.
4 Granderson, 511 U.S. 39, 54 (1994). Second, if the Court accepts the Government’s 5 untethered theory that state-owned companies can constitute government 6 “instrumentalities,” and their employees constitute “foreign officials,” the statute is 7 unconstitutionally vague as applied to Defendants. Simply stated, it is well-settled that 8 the Due Process Clause of the United States Constitution requires that “fair 9 warning . . . be given to the world in language that the common world will understand,
10 of what the law intends to do if a certain line is passed.” McBoyle v. United States, 11 283 U.S. 25, 27 (1931). Where a statute employs “terms so vague that men of 12 common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its 13 application,” the statute is unconstitutional. Connally v. Gen. Const. Co., 269 U.S.
14 385, 391 (1926) (citation omitted).

15 III. LEGAL STANDARD

16 A defendant may raise, by pretrial motion, any defense “that the court can 17 determine without a trial of the general issue.” Fed. R. Crim. P. 12(b). A defense is 18 appropriate for pretrial consideration when trial “would be of no assistance in 19 determining [its] validity.” United States v. Covington, 395 U.S. 57, 60 (1969); United 20 States v. Shortt Accountancy Corp., 785 F.2d 1448, 1452 (9th Cir. 1986) (“A pretrial 21 motion is generally capable of determination before trial if it involves questions of law 22 rather than fact.”) (internal quotation marks omitted). “The court must decide every 23 pretrial motion before trial unless it finds good cause to defer a ruling.” Fed. R. Crim.
24 P. 12(d).

25 In ruling on a pretrial motion to dismiss an indictment for failure to state an 26 offense, “the court must accept the truth of the allegations in the indictment in 27 analyzing whether a cognizable offense has been charged. The indictment either states 28 an offense or it doesn’t.” United States v. Boren, 278 F.3d 911, 914 (9th Cir. 2002)

1 (internal citations omitted). Importantly, however, even if an indictment alleges each 2 element of an offense, it nonetheless fails when “the specific facts alleged . . . fall 3 beyond the scope of the relevant criminal statute, as a matter of statutory 4 interpretation.” United States v. Panarella, 277 F.3d 678, 685 (3d Cir. 2002). Thus, 5 although the court may not “invade the province of the jury” by deciding disputed 6 issues of fact, it can and should resolve before trial any “pure issue of law” that the 7 undisputed facts present. See United States v. Phillips, 367 F.3d 846, 855-56 & n.25
 8 (9th Cir. 2004) (considering whether, on undisputed facts, a particular creek was a 9 “navigable water” under the Clean Water Act).

10 In the instant case, the substantive FCPA counts (Counts Two through Ten) rest 11 entirely on the legal conclusion that each of a number of foreign companies – solely by 12 dint of being state-owned in some fashion¹ – constitutes a “department, agency and 13 instrumentality of a foreign government,” and that its officers and employees therefore 14 are deemed “‘foreign officials’ within the meaning of the FCPA.” Indictment, ¶ 12.
 15 But even assuming for purposes of this Motion the truth of the facts alleged in the 16 Indictment, i.e., that each of the companies at issue had partial or total state 17 ownership, Counts Two through Ten of the Indictment must be dismissed because, as 18 a matter of statutory interpretation, state-owned enterprises fall beyond the scope of 19 the FCPA’s definition of “instrumentality,” and their officers and employees therefore 20 cannot be deemed “foreign officials” under the FCPA.

21 Additionally, Count One must be dismissed to the extent it alleges a conspiracy 22 to violate the FCPA by bribing these non-foreign officials. See United States v.
 23 Galardi, 476 F.2d 1072, 1079 (9th Cir. 1973) (“It should require no citation of 25 ¹ The Indictment alleges that each of the following businesses was “state-owned”:

 26 Jiangsu Nuclear Power Corporation (“JNPC”) (China), Guohua Electric Power 27 (China), China Petroleum Materials and Equipment Corporation (“CPMEC”)
 28 (China), PetroChina (China), Dongfang Electric Corporation (China), China National Offshore Oil Corporation (“CNOOC”) (China), Korea Hydro and Nuclear Power (“KHNP”) (Korea), Petronas (Malaysia), and National Petroleum Construction Company (“NPCC”) (United Arab Emirates). Indictment, ¶ 12.

1 authority to say that a person cannot conspire to commit a crime against the United 2 States when the facts reveal there could be no violation of the statute under which the 3 conspiracy is charged.”). And since the legally defective FCPA allegations infect the 4 entire conspiracy count, the count must be dismissed in its entirety. Where there is a 5 defect in an indictment, a court may identify the flaws in the indictment, but correcting 6 the flaws is beyond the court’s power; the court “can neither act for a grand jury, nor 7 speculate whether a grand jury would have indicted the named defendants had it 8 realized that the indictment as written was overbroad.” United States v. Camiel, 689 9 F.2d 31, 39 (3d Cir. 1982); see also Carney v. United States, 163 F.2d 784, 790 (9th 10 Cir. 1947) (“neither the trial court nor this court can speculate on the intent of the 11 grand jury”). Where, as here, there is a reasonable possibility that the inclusion of an 12 improper rule of law infected a count in an indictment, the Court must dismiss the 13 count in its entirety. See, e.g., United States v. D’Alessio, 822 F. Supp. 1134, 1145-46 14 (D.N.J. 1993).

15 Because trial would be of no assistance in determining the validity of 16 Defendants’ purely legal arguments, this Motion is appropriate for resolution before 17 trial. See Fed. R. Crim. P. 12(b); Covington, 395 U.S. at 60-61.

19 A. The FCPA Does Not Apply To The Conduct Charged In The Indictment 20 Because, As A Matter Of Law, The Officers And Employees Of State- 21 Owned Companies Are Not “Foreign Officials.”

22 To violate the anti-bribery provisions of the FCPA, a corrupt payment must be 23 directed to a “foreign official” or a “foreign political party or official thereof or any 24 candidate for foreign political office.” 15 U.S.C. § 78dd-2(a)(1)-(2). The statute 25 defines the term “foreign official” as:

26 any officer or employee of a foreign government or any department, 27 agency, or instrumentality thereof, or of a public international 28 organization, or any person acting in an official capacity for or on behalf

1 of any such government or department, agency, or instrumentality, or for 2 or on behalf of any such public international organization.

3 15 U.S.C. § 78dd-2(h)(2). Though the term “public international organization” is 4 separately defined, “instrumentality” (like “department” and “agency”) is not.

5 No court has meaningfully construed the term “instrumentality” in the FCPA; in 6 the absence of such case law, the Department of Justice (“DOJ”) has liberally pushed 7 the envelope and staked out a maximalist position as to the meaning of the term – a 8 position that finds no support in the express language of the statute, canons of statutory 9 construction, or the legislative history. Specifically, the Government has baldly 10 asserted that the term “instrumentality,” as it appears in the FCPA, includes “state-11 owned” business enterprises, and that, therefore, all employees of such enterprises – 12 regardless of rank, position, function, or duties – are “foreign officials” within the 13 meaning of the FCPA. The Government’s position was summarized in a written 14 submission to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development 15 (“OECD”)² – a submission the Government was required to prepare as a signatory to 16 the OECD’s Convention on Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in 17 International Business Transactions (“the OECD Convention”)³:

18 Although the FCPA does not contain an explicit reference to “public 19 enterprises” or any definition thereof, the United States [Government] has 20 consistently applied . . . the FCPA to cover bribery of officials of public 21 enterprises. State-owned business enterprises may, in appropriate

³ The United States signed the OECD Convention on December 17, 1997.

1 circumstances, be considered instrumentalities of a foreign government 2 and their officers and employees to be foreign officials.⁴

3 See Declaration of Nicola T. Hanna (“Hanna Decl.”), Exh. B (U.S. Response to OECD

5 The precise level of ownership the Government believes is necessary to convert 6 a private entity into a foreign governmental entity for the purposes of the FCPA – i.e., 7 what it deems an “appropriate circumstance[]” – is indecipherable and certainly not 8 informed by the language of the statute. Apparently, however, it is something less than 9 majority ownership, because the DOJ has taken the position in other cases that even 10 entities that are majority-owned by private parties may constitute government 11 “instrumentalities” under the FCPA. Indeed, in recent years, the DOJ and the 12 Securities and Exchange Commission (“SEC”) have settled FCPA enforcement actions 13 premised on alleged corrupt payments made to employees of state-owned business 14 enterprises that were demonstrably only minority-owned by a foreign government.
15 See, e.g., Hanna Decl., Exh. C (United States v. Kellogg Brown & Root LLC, Crim.
16 No. H-09-071 (S.D. Tex.) & SEC v. Halliburton Company & KBR Inc., Civ. No. 4:09-17 399 (S.D. Tex.)) (alleging bribes paid to “foreign official” officers and employees of 18 Nigeria LNG Limited, which was 49% owned by Nigeria’s state-owned oil

22 ⁴ Although the Government has alleged in this case that each of the 23 aforementioned business enterprises was “a department, agency and 24 instrumentality” of a foreign government, Indictment, at ¶ 12 (emphasis added), 25 there is no basis to assert that any of the entities identified in the Indictment are 26 “departments” or “agencies” of a foreign government. And indeed, the 27 Government’s response to the OECD questionnaire confirms that state-owned 28 businesses, in the Government’s view, fall under the FCPA as 29 “instrumentalities.”

30 ⁵ Nigeria LNG Limited is jointly owned by Nigerian National Petroleum 31 Corporation (49%), Shell (25.6%), Total LNG Nigeria Ltd (15%) and Eni 32 (10.4%). See Hanna Decl., Exh. E.

1 employees of Telekom Malaysia Berhad, which was 43% owned by the Malaysian 2 government, were “foreign officials”⁶).

3 The DOJ’s view regarding the reach of the term instrumentality, however, 4 frequently has been questioned by legal commentators and even by the OECD itself.
5 Indeed, the Government’s application of the “foreign official” element to employees of 6 public enterprises was identified as a problem area in the OECD’s review of the FCPA 7 in 2002:⁷

8 Another area of potential uncertainty under the FCPA involves officials of 9 public enterprises. Such enterprises are covered in U.S. law as 10 “instrumentalities”, making their officers, directors, employees, etc., 11 “foreign officials” under the FCPA. Neither the statute nor its history 12 define the term “instrumentality”, thus leaving it to U.S. companies to 13 determine whether an enterprise is an instrumentality or not. This can be 14 difficult in some cases. For instance, are “instrumentalities” only 15 enterprises that are wholly or majority-owned by the foreign government?
16 Does the term “instrumentality” cover enterprises that are controlled by 17 the government, or entities in the process of privatisation?

18 Hanna Decl., Exh. G (OECD’s Phase II Report on the U.S.) at ¶ 108 (emphasis added).
19 Despite this persistent questioning, however, no court has ever been presented with a 20 comprehensive history of the FCPA to aid a meaningful ruling on the Government’s 21 expansive interpretation. The reason is simple: although Congress enacted the FCPA

23 ⁶ Telekom Malaysia Berhad’s largest shareholders are Khazanah Nasional
24 Berhad (33.9%), Employees Provident Fund Board (12.15%), and AmanahRaya 25 Trustees Berhad (10.26%). See Hanna Decl., Exh. F. The DOJ indictment alleged that the Malaysian Ministry of Finance owned approximately 43% of Telekom Malaysia’s shares. See id., Exh. D, ¶ 21.

26 ⁷ The purpose of the OECD’s 2002 review “was to study the structures in place in 27 the United States to enforce the laws and regulations implementing the 28 Convention and to assess their application in practice, as well as to monitor the United States’ compliance in practice with the 1997 Recommendation.” Hanna Decl., Exh. G (OECD’s Phase II Report on the U.S.) at ¶ 4.

1 in 1977, law enforcement activity under the statute largely sat dormant until the early 2 2000s, and most DOJ and SEC prosecutions historically have involved corporations 3 (not individuals, the prosecution of whom is a relatively recent phenomenon⁸), which 4 tend to resolve such matters expeditiously (whether by way of a plea agreement, 5 deferred prosecution agreement, or otherwise) rather than through lengthy court fights 6 with the Government. See Declaration of Professor Michael J. Koehler (“Koehler
7 Decl.”), Exhs. 100-101. For these reasons, the Government’s position has avoided 8 serious judicial scrutiny.

9 Given the absence of any meaningful case law supporting its expansive 10 interpretation since the advent of the FCPA in 1977, the Government is likely to rely 11 upon two recent orders – one from the Eastern District of Pennsylvania (United States 12 v. Nguyen) and one from the Southern District of Florida (United States v. Esquenazi) 13 – denying motions to dismiss. See Hanna Decl., Exhs. I & J (attaching orders). Those 14 orders are not binding on this Court and should be given no weight. In the Nguyen 15 case, the court denied defendants’ motion in a one-sentence order that contains no 16 analysis.⁹ And while slightly longer (3 pages), the order in the Esquenazi case is 17 equally conclusory and devoid of any substantive analysis. Neither court was 18 presented with, or considered, the extensive legislative history of the FCPA.
19 Additionally, the defendant in the Esquenazi case, who borrowed liberally and 20 haphazardly from the defendants’ brief in Nguyen (including citing to Third Circuit, 21 rather than Eleventh Circuit, case law and also borrowing facts from Nguyen that were

23 ⁸ In 2004, the DOJ charged two individuals under the FCPA; in 2005, the DOJ
24 charged five individuals; in 2009 and 2010 combined, the DOJ charged over 50 25 individuals. See Hanna Decl., Exh. H (Comments of Assistant Attorney General 26 Breuer at the 24th National Conference on the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act 27 (Nov. 16, 2010)); Declaration of Professor Michael J. Koehler, Exh. 100.

28 ⁹ Additionally, after Mr. Nguyen pled guilty, the Court stated at his sentencing that there was insufficient evidence to conclude that the alleged recipient of the bribe was a “foreign official.” See Hanna Decl., Exh. K (relevant portions of Sept. 15, 2010 Nguyen sentencing transcript) at 52.

1 not applicable to his case) also serially filed at least five other motions to dismiss, 2 some of which appeared to lack even facial merit (e.g., a motion to dismiss for 3 selective and vindictive prosecution that alleged racism on the Government's part), 4 which may have colored the court's view. Additionally, the defendants in Nguyen and 5 Esquenazi made arguments that appeared to hinge on disputed issues of fact, and in 6 both cases the Government argued that the motions were premature. The present 7 Motion, in contrast, calls for a determination of a purely legal question. Indeed, for the 8 purpose of deciding Defendants' Motion, the Court can assume that the companies 9 named in the Indictment are 100% state-owned. Accordingly, despite the perfunctory 10 orders in Nguyen and Esquenazi, the Court here is presented with an issue of first 11 impression.

12 As discussed in detail below, the Government's position is not supported by the 13 language of the statute and is wrong as a matter of law. The FCPA's definition of 14 "foreign official" cannot be stretched to encompass employees of state-owned 15 companies.

16 1. The Ordinary Meaning Of The Term "Instrumentality" As 17 Used In The FCPA Does Not Encompass State-Owned Business
18 Enterprises.

19 The FCPA does not define the term "instrumentality." Generally, in the absence 20 of a statutory definition, the Court should start with a term's ordinary meaning. See 21 United States v. Santos, 553 U.S. 507, 511 (2008) ("When a term is undefined, we give 22 it its ordinary meaning."); FDIC v. Meyer, 510 U.S. 471, 476 (1994) (where a term is 23 not defined by statute, "we construe a statutory term in accordance with its ordinary or 24 natural meaning."). Courts often rely upon dictionary definitions to ascertain a word's 25 "ordinary meaning." See, e.g., Santos, 553 U.S. at 511. Additionally, "[s]ince context 26 gives meaning," a term must be considered "not in isolation but as it is used in the 27 [relevant] statute." Id. at 512. This is especially true when the relevant term has 28 multivariate meanings.

1 In the present case, dictionary definitions of “instrumentality” do not shed
 2 considerable light on the issue presented to this Court and largely beg the question.¹⁰
 3 As it is “used in the statute,” however, the term plainly does not encompass state-4 owned enterprises. Rather, the term encompasses governmental units and subdivisions 5 that are akin to departments and agencies.

6 a. Under The Doctrine Of Noscitur A Sociis, The Term 7 “Instrumentality” Must Be Construed In Relation To The 8 Terms That Precede It.

9 Under the statutory-construction doctrine of noscitur a sociis, a word should be 10 considered in context, particularly if in isolation it would be susceptible of several 11 interpretations. See Dole v. United Steelworkers of America, 494 U.S. 26, 36 (1990)
 12 (“words grouped in a list should be given related meaning”). Where a statute presents 13 a ““constructional problem,”” it may be ““resolved by the ... principle ... that a word is 14 known by the company it keeps (the doctrine of noscitur a sociis).” We have similarly 15 recognized “that words are to be judged by their context and that words in a series are 16 to be understood by neighboring words in the series.”” United States v. King, 244 F.3d 17 736, 740 (9th Cir. 2001) (quoting Gustafson v. Alloyd Co., 513 U.S. 561, 575 (1995) 18 and United States v. Carpenter, 933 F.2d 748, 750-51 (9th Cir. 1991), respectively)
 19 (alterations in original); cf. Shell Oil Co v. Iowa Dept. of Revenue, 488 U.S. 19, 25 n.6

 21 ¹⁰ For example, “instrumentality” has been variously defined as “a thing used to 22 achieve an end or purpose” (Black’s Law Dictionary (8th ed. 2004) (def. 1)), “a 23 means; an agency” (American Heritage Dictionary (4th ed. 2000) (def. 2)), and 24 “a means or agency through which a function of another entity is accomplished, 25 such as a branch of a governing body” (Black’s Law Dictionary (8th ed. 2004) 26 (def. 1)). See also American Heritage Dictionary (4th ed. 2000) (def. 3: “A 27 subsidiary branch, as of a government, by means of which functions or policies 28 are carried out.”); Merriam-Webster’s Dictionary of Law (1996) (def. 2: “something that serves as an intermediary or agent through which one or more functions of a larger controlling entity are carried out : a part or branch esp. of a governing body”). Using the first definition of “a thing used to achieve an end or purpose,” “instrumentality” standing alone might cover any person or entity hired by a foreign government to accomplish a purpose – including the myriad U.S. corporations and professional firms that are often hired by foreign governments (for example, IBM, Microsoft, and many large accounting and law firms).

1 (1988) (“As Judge Learned Hand so eloquently noted: ‘Words are not pebbles in alien 2 juxtaposition; they have only a communal existence; and not only does the meaning of 3 each interpenetrate the other, but all in their aggregate take their purport from the 4 setting in which they are used’”) (quoting NLRB v Federbush Co., 121 F.2d 954, 5 957 (2nd Cir. 1941)). The United States Supreme Court has opined that “[t]he maxim 6 noscitur a sociis, . . . while not an inescapable rule, is often wisely applied where a 7 word is capable of many meanings in order to avoid the giving of unintended breadth
8 to the Acts of Congress.” Gutierrez v. Ada, 528 U.S. 250, 255 (2000) (quoting Jarecki 9 v. G.D. Searle & Co., 367 U.S. 303, 307 (1961)) (emphasis added) (ellipsis in 10 original).

11 Thus, for example, the Supreme Court recently relied on the doctrine of noscitur 12 a sociis to ascertain the meaning of the words “promotes” and “presents” in the context 13 of a string of operative verbs – “advertises, promotes, presents, distributes, or solicits” 14 – in 18 U.S.C. § 2252A(a)(3)(B). United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285 (2008). The 15 Court observed:

16 When taken in isolation, the ... verbs – “promotes” and “presents” – are 17 susceptible of multiple and wide-ranging meanings. In context, however, 18 those meanings are narrowed by the commonsense canon of noscitur a 19 sociis – which counsels that a word is given more precise content by the 20 neighboring words with which it is associated. “Promotes,” in a list that 21 includes “solicits,” “distributes,” and “advertises,” is most sensibly read to 22 mean the act of recommending purported child pornography to another 23 person for his acquisition. . . . Similarly, “presents,” in the context of the 24 other verbs with which it is associated, means showing or offering the 25 child pornography to another person with a view to his acquisition.

26 553 U.S. at 294-95 (citations omitted).

27 Similarly, the Supreme Court relied upon the doctrine of noscitur a sociis to 28 give proper scope to the term “discovery” for purposes of a Tax Code provision that

1 afforded special treatment to “[i]ncome resulting from exploration, discovery, or 2 prospecting.” Jarecki v. G. D. Searle Co., 367 U.S. 303, 305 (1961). The Court noted 3 that, standing alone, “discovery” could mean many different things; in the statute, 4 however, it “d[id] not stand alone, but gather[ed] meaning from the words around it, 5 [which] ... strongly suggest that a precise and narrow application was intended.” Id. at 6 307. Faced with a disjunctive list of three terms, the Court considered what industries 7 all three terms would apply to: “The three words in conjunction, ‘exploration,’ 8 ‘discovery’ and ‘prospecting,’ all describe income-producing activity in the oil and gas 9 and mining industries, but it is difficult to conceive of any other industry to which they 10 all apply.” Id. Thus, the Court found that “application of the maxim [noscitur a 11 sociis] . . . [led] to the conclusion that ‘discovery’ in § 456 means only the discovery of 12 mineral resources,” and that income from the sales of certain new products did not fall 13 within its ambit. Id.

14 The Ninth Circuit also has relied on the doctrine. See, e.g., Microsoft Corp. v.
15 Comm’r, 311 F.3d 1178, 1184-85 (9th Cir. 2002) (“The doctrine of noscitur a sociis
16 counsels that words should be understood by the company they keep. . . . Applying 17 these doctrines, the excluded items . . . should be understood to have something in 18 common that the excepted copyrights do not.”); Company v. United States (In re 19 United States), 349 F.3d 1132, 1142 & n.21 (9th Cir. 2003) (applying noscitur a sociis
20 and another canon of construction to “confirm[] the meaning of the term ‘other person’ 21 otherwise suggested by the structure and logic of” 18 U.S.C. § 2518(4)).

22 Here, application of the doctrine of noscitur a sociis reveals that the term 23 “instrumentality” should not be broadly construed to encompass state-owned 24 enterprises. Within the FCPA’s definition of “foreign official,” the term 25 “instrumentality” occurs as the last item in a list – “foreign government or any 26 department, agency, or instrumentality thereof.” (emphasis added). “Departments” 27 and “agencies” are subdivisions, units, or organs of a government that carry out 28 functions of the government. In the United States, by way of example, there is the 1 Department of Agriculture and the Environmental Protection Agency. But 2 governments also have myriad bureaus, boards, administrations, commissions, and the 3 like that also carry out governmental functions. And in foreign countries, certain 4 governmental subdivisions may go by names – “ministry,” for example – that are not 5 used in the United States. It is these other governmental entities – entities that do not 6 technically fall under the definition of “department” or “agency” but are akin to 7 departments and agencies – that the term “instrumentality” should be construed to 8 cover.¹¹ Indeed, when read in this manner, “instrumentality” fits naturally with its 9 statutory neighbors. In contrast, the Government’s proposed reading of 10 “instrumentality” as encompassing any entity in which a government has a monetary 11 investment makes that term fundamentally different from the first three since a 12 business enterprise, regardless of any investment by a foreign government, cannot 13 fairly be said to be carrying out governmental (rather than commercial) functions – at 14 least not in the sense that governmental departments and agencies are carrying out 15 governmental functions.

16 b. Officers And Employees Of State-Owned Companies Could Not 17 Reasonably Be Called “Officials” Of A Foreign Government.

18 The definition of “instrumentality” as a governmental entity akin to a 19 department or agency is further bolstered by the FCPA’s use of the term “foreign 20 official.” Employees of a governmental bureau, board, or commission – like 21 employees of the government itself and the government’s departments and agencies – 22 could logically be called “officials” of the government. Indeed, the second part of the 23 definition of “foreign official” refers to “any person acting in an official capacity for or 24

25 ¹¹ In the United States, the FBI, for example, is neither a “department” nor an 26 “agency” – it is a bureau of the Department of Justice – but it most certainly is 27 an “instrumentality” of the U.S. government. Other examples of government 28 “instrumentalities” in the United States abound: the National Transportation Safety Board, the Federal Trade Commission, the National Labor Relations Board, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and the Social Security Administration, among others.

1 on behalf of any such government or department, agency, or instrumentality.” 15 2 U.S.C. § 78dd-2(h)(2). But employees of a state-owned company, including the 3 company’s “Vice Presidents, Engineering Managers, General Managers, Procurement 4 Managers, and Purchasing Officers” (Indictment, ¶ 12), could not reasonably be called 5 “officials” of a foreign government. Indeed, if the Government’s view were adopted, 6 even the janitor of a state-owned commercial enterprise would be considered a 7 “foreign official.” Cf. In re Grand Jury Subpoena Dated August 9, 2000, 218 F. Supp.
 8 2d 544, 557 (S.D.N.Y. 2002) (describing the FCPA as involving “foreign public 9 officials”; “by definition, violations of the FCPA touch upon ‘official acts’ of 10 sovereign nations, and every investigation of a suspected violation of the FCPA has the 11 potential to impugn the integrity of the officials of foreign sovereigns”); United States 12 v. Blondek, 741 F. Supp. 116, 120 (N.D. Tex. 1990) (referring to “foreign officials” as 13 a “small class of persons” and a “well-defined group”).¹²

14 c. Other Provisions Of The FCPA Make Clear That The Term
 15 “Instrumentality” As Used In The FCPA Does Not Include 16 State-Owned Business Enterprises.

17 At least three other portions of the FCPA demonstrate that Congress intended 18 the term “instrumentality” to refer to a governmental entity comparable to a 19 “department” or “agency,” not to a commercial entity in which the government has an 20 ownership stake.

21 First, the structure of the FCPA’s anti-bribery provisions plainly is focused on 22 foreign public officials. In addition to the above discussion regarding the definition of 23 “foreign official,” it is noteworthy that the FCPA was amended in 1998 to add officers

24
 25 ¹² To further illustrate the principle that the term “foreign official” would not 26 logically refer to an employee of a state-owned company, 18 U.S.C. § 1116, 27 which provides penalties for murder or manslaughter of foreign officials, official 28 guests, and other internationally protected persons, and 18 U.S.C § 112, which provides penalties for otherwise harming those persons, both rely on the same definition of “foreign official,” which includes traditional government officials but not employees of state-owned enterprises.

1 and employees of “public international organization[s]” to the definition of “foreign 2 official.” See Pub. L. 105-366, 112 Stat. 3302 (1998) (emphasis added). “Public 3 international organizations” are expressly defined in the statute and are typically large, 4 intergovernmental organizations, such as the United Nations and several of its 5 agencies, the World Health Organization, the World Trade Organization, the 6 International Atomic Energy Agency, and the International Monetary Fund, among 7 others. 15 U.S.C. § 78dd-2(h)(2)(B); see also 22 U.S.C. § 288 (“the term 8 ‘international organization’ means a public international organization”). Additionally, 9 the FCPA prohibits corrupt payments not only to a “foreign official,” but also to “any 10 foreign political party or official thereof or any candidate for foreign political office.” 11 15 U.S.C. § 78dd-2(a)(2) (emphasis added). In short, the structure and language of the 12 FCPA demonstrate that the FCPA is aimed at preventing bribery of foreign public 13 officials. See also Hanna Decl., Exh. L (Commentary to Section 2C1.1 of the Federal 14 Sentencing Guidelines Manual, which applies to violations of the FCPA’s anti-bribery 15 provisions) (“Such offenses generally involve a payment to a foreign public official, 16 candidate for public office, or agent or intermediary, with the intent to influence an 17 official act or decision of a foreign government or political party. Typically, a case 18 prosecuted under these provisions will involve an intent to influence governmental 19 action.”) (emphasis added).

20 Second, the FCPA contains an “[e]xception for routine governmental action,” 21 which provides that the prohibition against making corrupt payments to foreign 22 officials “shall not apply to any facilitating or expediting payment to a foreign official .
 23 . . the purpose of which is to expedite or to secure the performance of a routine 24 governmental action by a foreign official” 15 U.S.C. § 78dd-2(b) (emphasis 25 added). This exception, which is intended to exclude so-called “grease” payments 26 from the scope of the FCPA, defines “routine governmental action” as follows:

27 (4) (A) The term ‘routine governmental action’ means only an action 28 which is ordinarily and commonly performed by a foreign official in—

1 (i) obtaining permits, licenses, or other official documents to 2 qualify a person to do business in a foreign country;

3 (ii) processing governmental papers, such as visas and work orders;

4 (iii) providing police protection, mail pick-up and delivery, or 5 scheduling inspections associated with contract performance or 6 inspections related to transit of goods across country;

7 (iv) providing phone service, power and water supply, loading and 8 unloading cargo, or protecting perishable products or commodities 9 from deterioration; or 10 (v) actions of a similar nature.

11 15 U.S.C. § 78dd-2(h)(4)(A). “Routine governmental actions” are performed by 12 employees of governmental departments, agencies, ministries, bureaus, boards, 13 administrations, and commissions – not by employees of state-owned commercial 14 enterprises. Thus, if the Government’s expansive interpretation of “instrumentality” 15 were correct, there would be no statutory exception for grease payments made to 16 employees of state-owned enterprises but there would be for payments to traditional 17 government officials. Put another way, under the Government’s view, it would be 18 legal to make a grease payment to a traditional government employee, but that same 19 payment to an employee of a state-owned entity would be illegal under the FCPA.
20 Such a convoluted result upsets the FCPA’s statutory scheme and is plainly not what 21 Congress intended.

22 Third, the FCPA contains an affirmative defense where the payment to the 23 foreign official “was a reasonable and bona fide expenditure, such as travel and 24 lodging expenses, incurred by or on behalf of a foreign official . . . and was directly 25 related to— . . .(B) the execution or performance of a contract with a foreign 26 government or agency thereof.” 15 U.S.C. § 78dd-2(c)(2)(B) (emphasis added).
27 Because this affirmative defense contains no mention of a contract with a foreign 28 “instrumentality,” if the term “instrumentality” encompasses state-owned businesses,

1 this affirmative defense apparently would not apply if a U.S. company made a payment 2 to an employee of a state-owned company for a bona fide expenditure related to the 3 execution or performance of a contract with the state-owned company. This again 4 makes no sense. There is no logical reason that Congress would have made this 5 affirmative defense available when contracts were with foreign government agencies 6 but not when contracts were with state-owned businesses. It also is possible, if not 7 likely, that the omission of the term “instrumentality” (as well as the term 8 “department”) from this affirmative defense was accidental; if so, it only further 9 underscores that Congress viewed “department,” “agency,” and “instrumentality” as 10 being comparable terms. In either instance, it is clear Congress was focused in the 11 FCPA on payments to foreign public officials, not employees of commercial 12 enterprises in which a foreign government has an ownership stake.

13 For the foregoing reasons, the term “instrumentality” should be construed to 14 mean a governmental entity that is akin to a department or agency, an interpretation 15 that plainly does not encompass state-owned business enterprises. Such a reading is 16 consistent with the overall structure of the FCPA itself, including its exceptions and 17 affirmative defenses.

18 2. The Government’s Proposed Interpretation Would Lead To 19 Absurd Results.

20 It is also a well-established maxim of statutory construction that interpretations 21 that lead to absurd results should be rejected. See United States v. Granderson, 511 22 U.S. 39, 47 n.5 (1994) (rejecting an interpretation that “leads to an absurd result”); 23 Dewsnup v. Timm, 502 U.S. 410, 427 (1992) (Scalia, J., dissenting) (“If possible, we 24 should avoid construing the statute in a way that produces such absurd results.”); 25 Public Citizen v. Department of Justice, 491 U.S. 440, 454 (1989) (“Where the literal 26 reading of a statutory term would compel ‘an odd result,’ . . . we must search for other 27 evidence of congressional intent to lend the term its proper scope.”). Here, the 28

1 Government's expansive reading of "instrumentality" should be rejected for the 2 additional reason that it leads to countless absurd results.

3 First, the Government's reading converts certain U.S. citizens living and 4 working in the United States into "foreign officials." For example, the Texas-based 5 company CITGO is now – and has been since 1990 – a wholly-owned subsidiary of a 6 Venezuelan-state-owned oil corporation, *Petróleos de Venezuela S.A.*¹³ See Hanna 7 Decl., Exh. M. As such, under the Government's view, CITGO, which is 8 headquartered in Houston and traces its corporate roots in the United States to 1910, is 9 an "instrumentality" of Venezuela, and all of its Houston-based officers and employees 10 are therefore "foreign officials" of Venezuela. Similarly, over the past several years, 11 sovereign wealth funds have purchased stakes in U.S. firms such as Citigroup (Abu 12 Dhabi's state investment fund), Morgan Stanley (China Investment Corporation), and 13 the Blackstone Group (China Investment Corporation). See Hanna Decl., Exh. N. If 14 the Government's view were correct, U.S. employees of those companies have all been 15 transformed into "foreign officials" of Abu Dhabi and China for purposes of the 16 FCPA. Plainly, the Government's interpretation of "instrumentality" – which allows 17 U.S. citizens living and working in the United States to be transformed into "foreign 18 officials" depending on the shifting winds of ownership of the companies for which 19 they work – is incorrect and must be rejected.¹⁴

21 ¹³ In a criminal information filed in November 2010, the DOJ charged Pride 22 International, Inc. with FCPA violations arising from bribes paid to an official of 23 Petróleos de Venezuela S.A. See United States v. Pride International, Inc., Criminal No. 10-766 (S.D. Tex. Nov. 4, 2010).

24 ¹⁴ Under the Government's interpretation, even companies that have shares traded 25 on public stock exchanges can be considered state-owned enterprises. For 26 example, Counts 2 and 3 involve alleged payments to employees of Korea 27 Hydro & Nuclear Power Co. ("KHNP"). KHNP is a wholly-owned subsidiary 28 of Korea Electric Power Corp. ("KEPCO"). KEPCO, in turn, is a multi-national energy company and is publicly traded on the New York Stock Exchange and other international exchanges. During the relevant time period, the Korean government, through the Ministry of Knowledge Economy and the state-owned Korea Development Bank, owned approximately 54% of KEPCO's shares.

1 Second, if the Government's view were correct, in this day and age of 2 government bailouts of financial institutions and auto companies, government 3 "instrumentalities" – and thus "foreign officials" – are potentially created every time a 4 government takes an ownership interest in the commercial enterprise being bailed out.
 5 Are General Motors and AIG "instrumentalities" of the United States government as a 6 result of the government's ownership stake in them? And if the funds for those 7 bailouts had come not from the United States government but from the Chinese 8 government, would auto workers in Detroit and insurance salespeople in New York be 9 considered Chinese "foreign officials" under the FCPA?¹⁵ Indeed, given the Chinese 10 government's status as the largest investor in United States Treasury obligations, has 11 every federal government employee been transformed into a Chinese foreign official?
 12 This is where the "logic" of the Government's position inexorably leads, and it 13 provides yet a further reason why the Government's position must be rejected.¹⁶

14 3. The Legislative History Of The FCPA Demonstrates That 15 Congress Did Not Intend To Include Employees Of State- 16 Owned Business Enterprises Within The Meaning Of "Foreign 17 Official."

18 Where the meaning of statutory text is clear, there is no need to resort to 19 legislative history to discern the text's meaning. Where the statutory text is

21 Exh. O (KEPCO Form 6-K, Notes to Consolidated Financial Statements June 30, 2005 and 2004, p. 1).

22 ¹⁵ This is not a fanciful question. In fact, one of the new owners of GM following 23 an initial public offering of GM shares on November 18, 2010 is SAIC Motor, 24 GM's partner in China and a company that is owned by the Chinese 25 government." See Hanna Decl., Exh. P. Thus, if the Government's view is 26 correct, auto workers in Detroit are already Chinese "foreign officials," which 27 would come as surprising news to them. In fact, because of the U.S.
 28 government's investment in GM, the workers are simultaneously U.S. and Chinese government officials under the Government's theory.

¹⁶ Other similar absurdities abound. For example, under the Government's view, virtually every member of the Chinese labor force – almost one-sixth of the world's population – would be a "foreign official" because of the Chinese government's ownership role in most Chinese companies.

1 ambiguous, however, courts often look to legislative history to clarify the meaning of 2 the statute. See, e.g., Rewis v. United States, 401 U.S. 808, 812 (1971) (considering 3 first the statutory language, and then the legislative history, to determine the scope of a 4 criminal statute); Liparota v. United States, 471 U.S. 419, 424 (1985) (same).¹⁷ Here, 5 a review of the FCPA’s legislative history confirms that Congress did not intend the 6 statute to encompass payments made to employees of state-owned business enterprises.

7 First, there is nothing in the FCPA’s legislative history addressing the “any 8 department, agency, or instrumentality” portion of the “foreign official” definition.
9 See Koehler Decl. at ¶¶ 16-18. And there certainly is no express statement or 10 information in the FCPA’s legislative history to support the DOJ’s expansive legal 11 interpretation that alleged state-owned enterprises are “instrumentalities” of a foreign 12 government and that employees of state-owned enterprises are therefore “foreign 13 officials” under the FCPA’s anti-bribery provisions. See id.

14 Second, the FCPA was enacted in 1977 to prevent the recurrence of “severe 15 foreign policy problems” for the United States created by the revelation of multi-16 million-dollar bribes to high-ranking foreign government officials. See, e.g., Koehler 17 Decl. at ¶¶ 140 (quoting Senate Report No. 94-1031 [Koehler Decl., Exh. 29], at 3), 18 197 (quoting statement of Representative Eckhardt that “bribery of foreign officials” 19 by U.S. corporations creates “severe foreign policy problems”) and 243 (quoting H.R.
20 Rep. No. 95-640 (1977) [Koehler Decl., Exh. 46], at 5; see also id. at ¶ 222 (quoting 21 Senate Report No. 95-114 [Koehler Decl., Exh. 43], at 3 [noting the “severe adverse 22 effects” of revelations of bribery of foreign government officials]). Three particular 23 examples were enumerated in the House and Senate Reports accompanying the bills 24 that became the FCPA:

26 ¹⁷ There is some debate as to the propriety of considering legislative history in 27 criminal cases even when the text is unclear. See Santos, 553 U.S. at 513 n.3 28 (noting “the question [of] whether resort to legislative history is ever appropriate when interpreting a criminal statute”).

1 [I]n 1976, the Lockheed scandal [involving bribes paid to the Prime 2 Minister of Japan, inter alios] shook the Government of Japan to its 3 political foundation and gave opponents of close ties between the United 4 States and Japan an effective weapon with which to drive a wedge 5 between the two nations. In another instance, Prince Bernhardt [the 6 Inspector General of the Dutch Armed Forces and the husband of Queen 7 Juliana] of the Netherlands was forced to resign from his official position 8 as a result of an inquiry into allegations that he received $1 million in pay-9 offs from Lockheed. In Italy, alleged payments by Lockheed, Exxon, 10 Mobil Oil, and other corporations to officials of the Italian Government 11 [including the President, Prime Minister, and defense ministers] eroded 12 public support for that Government and jeopardized U.S. foreign policy, 13 not only with respect to Italy and the Mediterranean area, but with respect 14 to the entire NATO alliance as well.

15 Id. at ¶ 243 (quoting H.R. Rep. No. 95-640 [Koehler Decl., Exh. 46], at 5); see also id.

17 governments friendly to the United States in Japan, Italy, and the Netherlands have 18 come under intense pressure from their own people.”]).¹⁸

19 Beyond the ethical issues inherent in many kinds of bribery, Congress was 20 concerned about the special harm presented by bribery of foreign government officials: 21 “The revelation of improper payments invariably tends to embarrass friendly 22 governments, lower the esteem for the United States among the citizens of foreign 23 nations, and lend credence to the suspicions sown by foreign opponents of the United

24
25 ¹⁸ Time and again the Lockheed scandals were cited as the archexample of the 26 behavior the FCPA was meant to proscribe. See, e.g., Koehler Decl., ¶¶ 76 27 (quoting Senator Proxmire’s statement that “[w]hat we are concerned about is 28 the kind of payment that Lockheed, for example, engaged in...”), 159 (quoting Representative Murphy’s reference to the “Lockheed incident” and observing that its “foreign policy implications for the United States are staggering and in some cases, perhaps irreversible”), and 165 (similar).

2 of their nations.” Id. at ¶ 243 (quoting H.R. Rep. No. 95-640 [Koehler Decl., Exh. 46], 3 at 5) (emphasis added). Congress’s perception of this special harm was further 4 informed by the testimony of representatives of the U.S. State Department who were 5 invited to appear before Congress. See id. at ¶ 36 (quoting The Activities of American 6 Multinational Corporations Abroad: Hearings Before the House Subcomm. On 7 International Economic Policy of the Comm. on International Relations, 94th Cong.,

9 Deputy Legal Adviser, U.S. Department of State] [“Corruption of friendly foreign 10 governments can undermine the most important objectives of our foreign policy.”]);

14 Deputy Secretary of the U.S. Department of State] [“I wish to state for the record that 15 grievous damage has been done to the foreign relations of the United States by recent 16 disclosures. . . . It is a fact that public discussion in this country of the alleged 17 misdeeds of officials of foreign governments cannot fail to damage our relations with 18 these governments.”]).

19 Accordingly, the FCPA was designed to eradicate the bribery of foreign 20 government officials that had proven to be so corrosive of the United States’s foreign 21 policy interests. See H.R. Rep. No. 95-640 [Koehler Decl., Exh. 46], at 5; RALPH H.

 4 foreign countries and the solution would necessarily implicate foreign policy interests.
 5 . . . [The FCPA] was in fact widely understood as an instrument of foreign policy,

 11 (statement of Sen. Proxmire)).¹⁹

12 The goal of preventing the special harm posed by bribery of foreign government 13 officials is evident in several features of the FCPA (as originally passed and as 14 amended in 1988 and 1998) – most obviously, in the statute’s limitation to bribery of 15 “foreign officials.” Though Congress could have criminalized bribery of any foreign 16 person affecting foreign commerce, see U.S. CONST. art. 1, § 8, cl. 3 (granting 17 Congress authority “[t]o regulate commerce with foreign nations”), it chose instead to 18 tailor the FCPA narrowly to the special harm, criminalizing only the bribery of 19 “foreign officials.” Plainly, Congress intended some foreign bribe recipients to fall 20 within the ambit of the Act and others to fall outside of it. Even if the precise meaning

 23 ¹⁹ Later Congresses, subsequent to the Ninety-Fifth that passed the FCPA, 24 reaffirmed the primary purpose of the statute. See, e.g., Koehler Decl. at ¶¶ 300, 25 301 (noting that in hearings held in 1981 and 1982 to “examine the underlying 26 reasons for the [FCPA], its purposes, the conditions it sought to deal with, and 27 the public policy it sought to achieve,” “Representative Robert Eckhardt, 28 principal author of FCPA (in the House of Representatives) discussed the Lockheed payments and the fall of the Prime Minister of Japan and implication of the Prince of The Netherlands as being major factors prompting Congress to enact the FCPA” (quoting Hearings Before the Subcommittee on Telecommunications, Consumer Protection, and Finance of the Committee on Energy and Commerce, House of Representatives, 97th Congress, (Sept. 16, Nov. 16, Dec. 16, 1981 and June 8, 1982) [Koehler Decl., Exh. 61], at 3).

1 of “foreign officials” is not self-evident, the salient point here is that Congress chose 2 to include such a limitation at all, as opposed to creating a general overseas anti-3 bribery statute.

4 Third, in the legislative history relevant to enactment of the FCPA, the 5 following terms were all used to describe the alleged recipients of certain foreign 6 corporate payments being investigated by Congress: “foreign government official,” 7 “foreign public official,” and “foreign official.” See Koehler Decl. at ¶¶ 16(b), 46. In 8 many cases, the same sentence or paragraph of congressional testimony or reports 9 contains different combinations of these terms. Id. It is clear from this legislative 10 history that the terms “foreign government official,” “foreign public official” and 11 “foreign official” all refer to the same thing – traditional foreign government officials.
12 Id. The term “foreign official” – the shortest of the three terms commonly used – 13 quickly developed into a short-hand or condensed term to describe traditional foreign 14 government officials throughout the FCPA’s legislative history. Id. In passing the 15 FCPA, Congress intended to prohibit payments to this narrow recipient category of 16 traditional foreign government officials performing official or public functions. Id.

17 Fourth, during its multi-year investigation of foreign corporate payments that 18 preceded adoption of the FCPA, Congress was aware of the existence of state-owned 19 enterprises and that some of the questionable payments uncovered or disclosed may 20 have involved such entities. See id., ¶¶ 16(c), 149-51, 230-31. Indeed, in certain of 21 the competing bills introduced in Congress to address foreign corporate payments, the 22 definition of “foreign government” expressly included state-owned enterprises. Id.
23 For instance, in August 1976, S. 3741 was introduced in the Senate and H.R. 15149 24 was introduced in the House. See id., ¶¶ 149, 151. Both bills defined “foreign 25 government” to include, among other things, “a corporation or other legal entity 26 established or owned by, and subject to control by, a foreign government.” See id., 27 ¶¶ 150, 151. Similarly, in June 1977, H.R. 7543 was introduced in the House. See id., 28 ¶ 230. H.R. 7543 defined “foreign government” to include “a corporation or other

1 legal entity established, owned, or subject to managerial control by a foreign 2 government.” See id., ¶ 231.

3 As to S. 3741 and H.R. 15149, an American Bar Association committee 4 informed the Chair of the House subcommittee holding hearings on these bills that the 5 definition of “foreign government” in these bills, specifically the portion of the 6 definition referring to “a corporation or other legal entity established or owned by, and 7 subject to control by, a foreign government” was “somewhat ambiguous.” See id., 8 ¶¶ 16(e), 167. The American Bar Association committee suggested a “more precise 9 definition of this aspect of the definition of ‘foreign government’ and proposed the 10 following language: “a legal entity which a foreign government owns or controls as 11 though an owner.” Id.

12 But despite being aware of the existence of state-owned enterprises, despite 13 exhibiting a capability for drafting a definition that expressly included such enterprises 14 in other bills, and despite being provided a more precise way to describe state-owned 15 enterprises, Congress chose not to include such definitions or concepts in S. 305 at all, 16 the bill that ultimately became the FCPA in December 1977. See id., ¶ 16(f). Cf. INS
17 v. Cardoza-Fonseca, 480 U.S. 421, 442-43 (1987) (“Few principles of statutory 18 construction are more compelling than the proposition that Congress does not intend 19 sub silentio to enact statutory language that it has earlier discarded in favor of other 20 language.”); Russello v. United States, 464 U.S. 16, 23-24 (1983) (“Where Congress 21 includes [certain] language in an earlier version of a bill but deletes it prior to 22 enactment, it may be presumed that the [omitted text] was not intended.”).

23 Finally, the 1988 and 1998 amendments to the FCPA further demonstrate that 24 Congress did not intend to include state-owned business enterprises in the scope of the 25 term “instrumentality.”

26 The FCPA originally defined “foreign official” as:

27 The term ‘foreign official’ means any officer or employee of a foreign 28 government or any department, agency, or instrumentality thereof, or any

1 person acting in an official capacity for or on behalf of any such 2 government or department, agency or instrumentality. Such term does 3 not include any employee of a foreign government or any department, 4 agency, or instrumentality thereof whose duties are essentially 5 ministerial or clerical.

6 See Koehler Decl., ¶ 280 (emphasis added). In 1988, Congress (among other changes 7 it made to the FCPA) removed the last sentence of the definition – which had been 8 included in the original statute as an indirect way to exclude “grease” payments from 9 the scope of the FCPA (see id., ¶¶ 282, 310, 313, 348) – and replaced it with the 10 express facilitating payment exception for “routine governmental action” now 11 embodied in 15 U.S.C. § 78dd-2(b). See id., ¶ 17, 381. As discussed above, the fact 12 that the exception for facilitating payments is tied to “routine governmental action” 13 indicates that Congress was focused on payments to foreign public officials. See 14 Section IV.A.1.c, supra.

15 In 1998, Congress again amended the definition of “foreign official” (among 16 other changes) to implement portions of the 1997 OECD Convention on Combating 17 Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions. Importing 18 certain language of the Convention, Congress expanded the definition to include 19 officers and employees of “public international organizations,” such as the U.N. See 20 International Anti-Bribery and Fair Competition Act of 1998, Pub. L. 105-366, 112 21 Stat. 3302 (Nov. 10, 1998) (emphasis added) [Koehler Decl., Exh. 96]; see also OECD
22 Convention on Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International 23 Business Transactions [Koehler Decl., Exh. 85].

24 Importantly, Congress chose not to adopt the Convention’s definition of 25 “foreign public official,” which is defined as “any person holding a legislative, 26 administrative or judicial office of a foreign country, whether appointed or elected; any 27 person exercising a public function for a foreign country, including for a public agency 28 or public enterprise; and any official or agent of a public international organization.”

1 See Koehler Decl., ¶¶ 17, 386, 395-398 (emphasis added). The Commentaries on the 2 Convention explicitly define “public enterprise” as:

3 any enterprise, regardless of its legal form, over which a government, or 4 governments, may, directly or indirectly, exercise a dominant influence.
5 This is deemed to be the case, inter alia, when the government or 6 governments hold the majority of the enterprise’s subscribed capital, 7 control the majority of votes attaching to shares issued by the enterprise or 8 can appoint a majority of the members of the enterprise’s administrative 9 or managerial body or supervisory board.

10 Commentaries, OECD Convention on Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials 11 in International Business Transactions, at ¶ 14. The Commentaries go on to state that 12 “[a]n official of a public enterprise shall be deemed to perform a public function unless 13 the enterprise operates on a normal commercial basis in the relevant market, i.e., on a 14 basis which is substantially equivalent to that of a private enterprise, without 15 preferential subsidies or other privileges.” Id. at ¶ 15.

16 Congress could have adopted these provisions in the 1998 amendments, but it 17 did not do so. Thus, while the DOJ takes the (incorrect) position that the term 18 “instrumentality” already implicitly included state-owned enterprises, the fact of the 19 matter is that Congress declined an opportunity to expressly include state-owned 20 enterprises in the statute in 1998. See Koehler Decl., ¶¶ 17, 385-89, 407, 428, 436-37.

21 As is evident, the Government’s expansive reading of “instrumentality” is not 22 supported by the legislative history of the FCPA and, if adopted by this Court, would 23 frustrate Congress’s intent by converting the FCPA into a general anti-bribery statute, 24 limited only by the requirement that the entity at issue have some amount of foreign 25 government investment.

1 4. Where Congress Wants To Define “Instrumentality” To Include 2 State-Owned Enterprises, It Knows How To Do So.

3 The Government’s position also should be rejected because Congress knows 4 how to define the term “instrumentality” as a function of government ownership of a 5 commercial enterprise where it desires to do so. It did not do so in the FCPA.

6 Where a particular element is explicitly set out in one statute, but it is not 7 likewise set out in the statute at issue, courts presume that Congress did not intend to 8 include that element in the statute at issue. See, e.g., Whitfield v. United States, 543
 9 U.S. 209, 216 (2005) (Congress has imposed an explicit overt act requirement in 22 10 conspiracy statutes, yet has not done so in the provision governing conspiracy to 11 commit money laundering); FCC v. NextWave Personal Communc’ns, Inc., 537 U.S.
 12 293, 302 (2003) (when Congress has intended to create exceptions to bankruptcy law 13 requirements, “it has done so clearly and expressly”); Meghrig v. KFC Western, Inc., 14 516 U.S. 479, 485 (1996) (“Congress . . . demonstrated in CERCLA that it knew how 15 to provide for the recovery of cleanup costs, and . . . the language used to define the 16 remedies under RCRA does not provide that remedy”); Franklin Nat’l Bank v. New 17 York, 347 U.S. 373, 378 (1954) (finding “no indication that Congress intended to make 18 this phase of national banking subject to local restrictions, as it has done by express 19 language in several other instances”).

20 Where Congress has intended the term “instrumentality” to include state-owned 21 enterprises, it has explicitly so provided. For example, for purposes of the Foreign 22 Sovereign Immunities Act, which was passed one year before the FCPA, the term 23 “‘agency or instrumentality of a foreign state’ means any entity . . . which is an organ 24 of a foreign state or political subdivision thereof, or a majority of whose shares or 25 other ownership interest is owned by a foreign state or political subdivision thereof.”²⁰

 27 ²⁰ Remarkably, the definition the Government proposes here for “instrumentality” 28 – an undefined term in the FCPA – is actually more expansive than the express definition provided in the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, which the

1 28 U.S.C. § 1603(b) (emphasis added); see also Dole Food Co. v. Patrickson, 538 U.S.
 2 468, 476 (2003) (Congress knows how to refer to an “owner” “in other than the formal 3 sense,” and did not do so in the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act’s definition of 4 foreign state “instrumentality”); 18 U.S.C. § 1839 (for purposes of the Economic 5 Espionage Act, “the term ‘foreign instrumentality’ means any agency, bureau, 6 ministry, component, institution, association, or any legal, commercial, or business 7 organization, corporation, firm, or entity that is substantially owned, controlled, 8 sponsored, commanded, managed, or dominated by a foreign government”). That 9 Congress has elsewhere explicitly equated instrumentality status with substantial or 10 majority ownership, but did not do so in the FCPA, indicates that Congress intended 11 the term “instrumentality” in the FCPA to be given its ordinary and most natural 12 reading in context, that is, an entity akin to a government department or agency.

13 Moreover, it is not the case that the term “instrumentality” is uniformly 14 understood to include state-owned enterprises in congressional enactments even in the 15 absence of a specific definition to that effect. For example, the three competing bills 16 that were proposed prior to the adoption of the FCPA that defined “foreign 17 government” to include “a corporation or other legal entity established, owned, or 18 subject to managerial control by a foreign government” expressly distinguished this 19 portion of the definition from the portion of the definition that included “a department, 20 agency, or branch of a foreign government.”²¹ See Koehler Decl., ¶¶ 149-51, 230-31.

23 Supreme Court has held does not extend to subsidiaries of a company that is 24 majority-owned by a foreign state or political subdivision thereof. See Dole 25 Food Co. v. Patrickson, 538 U.S. 468, 473 (2003); see also Gates v. Victor Fine 26 Foods, 54 F.3d 1457, 1462 (9th Cir. 1995). The Government’s proposed interpretation of “instrumentality” here has no such limitation, because certain of the foreign companies identified in the Indictment are not themselves state-owned enterprises, but rather are subsidiaries of such enterprises.

27 ²¹ In these proposed bills, “branch” appeared in the place of “instrumentality.” 28 This further suggests that “instrumentality” was meant to connote a traditional governmental unit or subdivision, like a department or agency.

1 And to take a more recent example, Section 1504 of the Dodd-Frank Wall Street
2 Reform and Consumer Protection Act, which became law in 2010 and imposes 3 requirements on certain resource extraction issuers to, inter alia, disclose information 4 regarding payments made to “foreign governments” for the purpose of the commercial 5 development of oil, natural gas or minerals, also distinguished between a government 6 “instrumentality,” on the one hand, and a state-owned enterprise, on the other. Pub. L.
7 111-203, 124 Stat. 1376, § 1054 (2010). Dodd-Frank defines “foreign government” to 8 “include[] a department, agency, or instrumentality of a foreign government, or a 9 company owned by a foreign government, as determined by the Commission.” Id.
10 (emphases added). If Congress believed the term “instrumentality” to encompass 11 state-owned enterprises without an express definition saying so, the foregoing 12 definition would have been redundant.

13 Finally, this principle is illustrated by the FCPA itself. Specifically, because 14 elsewhere in the FCPA Congress employed an explicit “control test” in defining the 15 responsibilities of corporate owners for acts of subsidiaries – but did not employ such a 16 test with respect to government “instrumentalities” – it is evident that Congress did not 17 intend for instrumentality status to turn on government ownership or control. One of 18 the FCPA’s accounting provisions instructs that “[w]here an issuer . . . holds 50 per 19 centum or less of the voting power with respect to a domestic or foreign firm, . . . the 20 issuer [shall] proceed in good faith to use its influence . . . to cause such domestic or 21 foreign firm to devise and maintain a system of internal accounting controls.” 15 22 U.S.C. § 78m(b)(6). Congress’s use of such a control test in the accounting provisions, 23 but not in the anti-bribery provisions’ definition of “foreign official” or 24 “instrumentality,” suggests that Congress did not intend the word “instrumentality” in 25 the anti-bribery provision to cover business entities that are owned or controlled by a 26 government. See, e.g., Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, 542 U.S. 692, 712 n.9 (2004) 27 (“[W]hen the legislature uses certain language in one part of the statute and different 28 language in another, the court assumes different meanings were intended.”) (citation

1 omitted). Had Congress intended “instrumentality” to reach state-owned commercial 2 enterprises, it would have spelled out the standard by which such enterprises would be 3 judged.

4 5. The Government’s Proposed Interpretation Would Render The 5 Statute Unconstitutionally Vague As Applied To Defendants.

6 Finally, as discussed infra, if the Court were to adopt the Government’s 7 amorphous interpretation of “instrumentality,” the FCPA would be rendered 8 unconstitutionally vague as applied to Defendants. Where possible, courts should 9 construe statutes in a manner that would not render them unconstitutional. See, e.g., 10 Skilling v. United States, 561 U.S. ___, 130 S. Ct. 2896, 2929 (2010) (“It has long been 11 our practice, however, before striking a federal statute as impermissibly vague, to 12 consider whether the prescription is amenable to a limiting construction.”).

13 The Supreme Court’s recent holding in the Skilling case is instructive. There, 14 the Supreme Court was faced with the question of whether the former Enron CEO’s 15 conviction for conspiracy to commit, inter alia, wire fraud to deprive Enron and its 16 shareholders of “the intangible right of his honest services” in violation of 18 U.S.C.
17 § 1346 was improper, and, if so, whether it was improper because (i) the charged 18 conduct – which did not involve an alleged bribe or kickback – was not, as a matter of 19 law, covered by the honest-services statute, or (ii) the statute was unconstitutionally 20 vague. Justices Scalia, Thomas, and Kennedy would have overturned Skilling’s 21 conviction on the basis that the statute was unconstitutionally vague. See 130 S. Ct. at 22 2940 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (“I would . . .
23 reverse Skilling’s conviction on the basis that § 1346 provides no ‘ascertainable 24 standard’ for the conduct it condemns.”). The majority, however, observing that there 25 was some body of conduct that “Congress certainly intended the statute to cover . . .[,] 26 par[ed] that body of precedent down to its core” – and held that Skilling’s conduct was 27 not included in the core – in order to preserve the validity of the statute. Id. at 2928.

28 The Court stated:

1 In view of this history, there is no doubt that Congress intended § 1346 to 2 reach at least bribes and kickbacks. Reading the statute to proscribe a 3 wider range of offensive conduct, we acknowledge, would raise the due 4 process concerns underlying the vagueness doctrine. To preserve the 5 statute without transgressing constitutional limitations, we now hold that 6 § 1346 criminalizes only the bribe-and-kickback core of the pre-McNally 7 case law.

8 Id. at 2931 (footnotes omitted). The Court went on to say that “[h]olding that honest-9 services fraud does not encompass conduct more wide-ranging than the paradigmatic 10 cases of bribes and kickbacks, we resist the Government’s less constrained 11 construction absent Congress’ clear instruction otherwise. . . . If Congress desires to 12 go further, we reiterate, it must speak more clearly than it has.” Id. at 2933 (citations 13 and internal quotation marks omitted).

14 The applicability of Skilling to the present case is clear. Congress plainly had a 15 “core” of “foreign officials” in mind when it enacted the FCPA. The legislative 16 history reveals that the core included presidents, prime ministers, princes, and other 17 traditional government officials. Interpreting “instrumentality” to mean a 18 governmental subdivision akin to a department or agency (e.g., a board, a bureau, a 19 commission, and so on) keeps that core of foreign officials intact and preserves the 20 heartland and constitutionality of the statute. But if the government’s expansive, 21 untethered, and standardless interpretation of “instrumentality” is accepted by the 22 Court, the statute will be rendered unconstitutionally vague (as discussed at greater 23 length, infra). Like the Supreme Court in Skilling, this Court should avoid invalidating 24 the statute by rejecting the government’s proposed interpretation. To borrow from the
27
28

1 language of the Skilling court, “[i]f Congress desires to go further . . . it must speak
2 more clearly than it has.” *Id.*²²

3 B. Unless The Government’s Interpretation Is “Unambiguously Correct,” 4 Application Of The Rule Of Lenity Requires Dismissal Of Counts One 5 Through Ten Of The Indictment.

6 For all of the reasons just described, the Court should find that, as a matter of 7 law, the word “instrumentality” as used in the FCPA cannot be stretched so far as to 8 include state-owned companies. But Defendants do not have to show that their 9 position is unquestionably correct in order to succeed with the instant Motion. Rather, 10 it is the Government’s position that must be proven “unambiguously correct” in order 11 for the charges against Defendants to stand. See United States v. Granderson, 511 12 U.S. 39, 54 (1994) (“[W]here text, structure, and history fail to establish that the 13 Government’s position is unambiguously correct,” the court must “apply the rule of 14 lenity and resolve the ambiguity in the defendant’s favor.”).

15 To the extent that there is any ambiguity in the term “instrumentality,” that 16 ambiguity must be resolved in Defendants’ favor by application of the rule of lenity.
17 See id.; Skilling, 130 S. Ct. at 2905-06 (invoking the “principle that ambiguity 18 concerning the ambit of criminal statutes should be resolved in favor of lenity”)
19 (citation and internal quotation marks omitted); United States v. Napier, 861 F.2d 547, 20 548-49 (9th Cir. 1988) (“It has long been settled that penal statutes are to be construed 21 strictly, and that one is not to be subjected to a penalty unless the words of the statute

22 ²² Unsurprisingly, the DOJ already is lobbying Congress to respond to the 23 Supreme Court’s decision in Skilling by amending the honest-services statute.
24 Assistant Attorney General Lanny A. Breuer explained the DOJ’s position at a 25 congressional hearing last September. Among other things, he noted that “in 26 order to follow the Supreme Court’s direction in Skilling that any legislation in 27 this area provide notice to citizens as to what conduct is prohibited, the statute 28 should be clear and specific.” See Hanna Decl., Exh. Q. If this Court concludes, as it should, that the term “instrumentality” in the FCPA does not encompass state-owned commercial enterprises, the DOJ can similarly lobby Congress to have the statute amended to provide “clear and specific” “notice to citizens as to what conduct is prohibited.” This is not unfair, but rather is precisely what the Constitution contemplates, and indeed, requires.

1 plainly impose it. This principle is founded on the sound policy that before criminal 2 penalties can be imposed fair warning should be given to the world in language that the 3 common world will understand, of what the law intends to do if a certain line is 4 passed.”) (internal quotation marks and citations omitted). “This venerable rule not 5 only vindicates the fundamental principle that no citizen should be held accountable 6 for a violation of a statute whose commands are uncertain, or subjected to punishment 7 that is not clearly prescribed. It also places the weight of inertia upon the party that 8 can best induce Congress to speak more clearly and keeps courts from making criminal 9 law in Congress’s stead.” Santos, 553 U.S. at 514.

10 The Supreme Court recently undertook an in-depth examination of the lenity 11 doctrine in United States v. Santos. That case turned on whether the word “proceeds” 12 in a federal money-laundering statute meant “receipts,” as the Government contended, 13 or “profits,” as defendant contended. The Court found, first, that both meanings were 14 consistent with ordinary usage and dictionary definitions. 553 U.S. at 512. Second, 15 either meaning would make sense in context; that is, the statute’s provisions would 16 make sense using either “profits” or “receipts” in place of the word “proceeds.” Id.
17 The Court thus concluded:

18 Under either of the word’s ordinary definitions, all provisions of the 19 federal money-laundering statute are coherent; no provisions are 20 redundant; and the statute is not rendered utterly absurd. From the face of 21 the statute, there is no more reason to think that “proceeds” means 22 “receipts” than there is to think that “proceeds” means “profits.” Under a 23 long line of our decisions, the tie must go to the defendant. The rule of 24 lenity requires ambiguous criminal laws to be interpreted in favor of the 25 defendants subjected to them. . . . Because the “profits” definition of 26 “proceeds” is always more defendant-friendly than the “receipts” 27 definition, the rule of lenity dictates that it should be adopted.

28 Id. at 513-14 (citations omitted).

1 The Santos Court’s rejection of the Government’s appeal to Congressional intent
2 is particularly instructive. The Government argued, first, that the defendant’s 3 proffered interpretation “fail[ed] to give the federal money-laundering statute its 4 proper scope and . . . hinder[ed] effective enforcement of the law.” Id. at 514. The 5 Government argued that “if [the Court did] not read ‘proceeds’ to mean ‘receipts,’ [it 6 would] disserve the purpose of the federal money-laundering statute, which is, the 7 Government [said], to penalize criminals who conceal or promote their illegal 8 activities.” Id.

9 The Supreme Court rejected this argument out of hand, calling it “a textbook 10 example of begging the question”:

11 To be sure, if “proceeds” meant “receipts,” one could say that the statute 12 was aimed at the dangers of concealment and promotion. But whether 13 “proceeds” means “receipts” is the very issue in the case. If “proceeds” 14 means “profits,” one could say that the statute is aimed at the distinctive 15 danger that arises from leaving in criminal hands the yields of a crime.
16 Id. at 515. Either one might have been the purpose of a “rational Congress.” Id. But, 17 the plurality said, “[w]hen interpreting a criminal statute, we do not play the part of a 18 mind reader.” Id. Quoting Chief Justice Marshall’s opinion in the “seminal rule-of-19 lenity decision,” the plurality said: “[P]robability is not a guide which a court, in 20 construing a penal statute, can safely take.” Id. (quoting United States v. Wiltberger, 21 18 U.S. 76, 5 Wheat. 76 (1820)) (alterations in original). The Court also cited Justice 22 Frankfurter: “When Congress leaves to the Judiciary the task of imputing to Congress 23 an undeclared will, the ambiguity should be resolved in favor of lenity.” Id. (quoting 24 Bell v. United States, 349 U.S. 81, 83 (1955)).

25 Second, the Government argued that the Court should adopt its “‘receipts’ 26 interpretation because – quite frankly – it is easier to prosecute,” as it would lessen the 27 Government’s evidentiary burden. Santos, 553 U.S. at 519. “Essentially,” the Court 28 said, “the Government asks us to resolve the statutory ambiguity in light of Congress’s

1 presumptive intent to facilitate money-laundering prosecutions.” Id. The Court flatly 2 rejected this position, which “turns the rule of lenity upside-down. We interpret 3 ambiguous criminal statutes in favor of defendants, not prosecutors.”²³ Id.

4 This Court would not be the first Court to dismiss an FCPA indictment on lenity
 5 grounds. In United States v. Bodmer, 342 F. Supp. 2d 176 (S.D.N.Y. 2004), the court 6 dismissed part of an indictment on lenity grounds in an FCPA case. Having 7 considered the plain meaning of the words of the statute and the relevant legislative 8 history (and observing that there were no judicial decisions interpreting the relevant 9 portion of the FCPA, and that “[t]he Government’s charging decision, standing alone, 10 does not establish the applicability of the statute,” 342 F. Supp. 2d at 187 n.10) the 11 Bodmer court found that it was unclear whether prior to the 1988 FCPA amendments, 12 certain foreign nonresident nationals could be prosecuted under the FCPA. See id. at 13 181-89. Accordingly, the Bodmer court dismissed the portion of the indictment 14 charging the defendant with conspiracy to violate the FCPA. See id. at 189.

15 Applying these principles to the present case, to the extent that there is any 16 ambiguity in the term “instrumentality,” that ambiguity must be resolved in 17 Defendants’ favor by application of the rule of lenity. See Granderson, 511 U.S. at 54 18 (1994) (“[W]here text, structure, and history fail to establish that the Government’s 19 position is unambiguously correct,” the court must “apply the rule of lenity and resolve 20 the ambiguity in [the defendant’s] favor.”). The Government cannot show that its 21 position as to the scope of the term “instrumentality” is “unambiguously correct.”

 23 ²³ Following the Santos decision, Congress amended the federal money-laundering 24 statute to expressly define “proceeds,” which was previously undefined in the 25 statute, as “any property derived from or obtained or retained, directly or 26 indirectly, through some form of unlawful activity, including the gross receipts
 27 of such activity.” 18 U.S.C. § 1956(c)(9) (emphasis added). This amendment 28 supported Justice Scalia’s observation in Santos that the rule of lenity “places the weight of inertia upon the party that can best induce Congress to speak more clearly and keeps courts from making criminal law in Congress’s stead.”
Santos, 553 U.S. at 514. Similarly, if the current Congress intends for the definition of “instrumentality” in the FCPA to include state-owned enterprises, it can and should amend the statute to state and define that expressly.

1 Indeed, in light of (i) the ordinary meaning of the word “instrumentality” as used in the 2 FCPA (ii) the absurd results that would flow from the Government’s interpretation, 3 (iii) the legislative history showing that Congress did not intend to create a general 4 anti-bribery statute but was concerned with the special harm posed by bribery of 5 foreign government officials, (iv) the fact that Congress knows how to include state-6 owned or state-controlled business enterprises in the definition of “instrumentality” 7 when it wants to do so but did not do so in the FCPA, and (v) the fact that the 8 Government’s proposed interpretation would render the statute unconstitutionally 9 vague, it would be impossible to say with certainty that Congress intended employees 10 of state-owned business enterprises to be deemed “foreign officials.” The statute, at 11 best, is ambiguous. Accordingly, even in the best case for the Government, the rule of 12 lenity applies and compels the dismissal of counts One through Ten of the Indictment.

13 C. In The Alternative, If The Government’s Interpretation Of 14 “Instrumentality” Is Correct, Then The Statute Is Unconstitutionally
15 Vague As Applied To Defendants.

16 If the Government is correct that employees of state-owned business enterprises 17 constitute “foreign officials,” then the FCPA as applied here is unconstitutional for 18 using “terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its 19 meaning and differ as to its application.” Connally v. Gen. Const. Co., 269 U.S. 385, 20 391 (1926) (citation omitted); accord United States v. Poindexter, 951 F.2d 369, 378 21 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (“[A] statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in 22 terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning 23 and differ as to its application, violates the first essential of due process of law.”).

24 The Due Process Clause of the United States Constitution requires that “fair 25 warning . . . be given to the world in language that the common world will understand,
26 of what the law intends to do if a certain line is passed.” McBoyle v. United States, 27 283 U.S. 25, 27 (1931). “To satisfy due process, a penal statute [must] define the 28 criminal offense [1] with sufficient definiteness that ordinary people can understand

1 what conduct is prohibited and [2] in a manner that does not encourage arbitrary and 2 discriminatory enforcement. The void-for-vagueness doctrine embraces these 3 requirements.” Skilling, 130 S. Ct. at 2927-28 (citation and internal quotation marks
4 omitted); see also Forbes v. Napolitano, 236 F.3d 1009, 1011 (9th Cir. 2000) (“If a 5 statute subjects transgressors to criminal penalties . . . vagueness review is even more 6 exacting. In addition to defining a core of proscribed behavior to give people 7 constructive notice of the law, a criminal statute must provide standards to prevent 8 arbitrary enforcement.”) (citations omitted). While there is an inherent limit to the 9 precision with which statutes can be drafted, “so far as possible the line should be 10 clear.” McBoyle, 283 U.S. at 27. Moreover, “statutes should not be written so as to be 11 understood by judges, legislators, lawyers, and law professors, but for the citizens 12 against whom they may one day be applied.” United States v. Saathoff, 708 F. Supp.
13 2d 1020, 1023 (S.D. Cal. 2010). The “touchstone” of fair warning is whether it was 14 “reasonably clear at the relevant time” that a defendant’s conduct was criminal under 15 “the statute, either standing alone or as construed.” United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S.
16 259, 267 (1997).

17 As noted, no court has ever thoroughly considered the “foreign official” 18 provision of the FCPA. The language seems clear enough on its face as a prohibition 19 against the bribery of officials of a foreign government or a department, agency, or 20 other similar political subdivision thereof. But the question for the Court is whether it 21 is “reasonably clear” from the face of the FCPA that employees of state-owned 22 business enterprises also constitute “foreign officials.” See Lanier, 520 U.S. at 267.
23 The answer is “no.” Defendants respectfully submit that few ordinary citizens would 24 ever imagine that, to take an extreme example, a gas station attendant at their local 25 CITGO station might be considered an “officer or employee of a foreign government 26 or any department, agency, or instrumentality thereof.” See 15 U.S.C. § 78dd-2(h)(2).
27 At best, one could only hazard a guess as to whether a gasoline company might 28 constitute a government “instrumentality.” But citizens should not be required to 1 guess whether their conduct violates a criminal statute. Thus, while the plain language

2 of the FCPA is clear enough in context, the Government’s forcing of an overbroad 3 gloss on the language renders it unclear.²⁴

4 Additionally, the Government’s refusal (or inability) to take a meaningful 5 position on exactly when the Government will consider a state-owned enterprise to be 6 a government “instrumentality” – the Government says only that “[s]tate-owned 7 business enterprises may, in appropriate circumstances, be considered 8 instrumentalities of a foreign government” (see pp. 7-8, supra) (emphasis added), but it 9 never defines what those “appropriate circumstances” are – unquestionably encourages 10 arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement of the statute. See, e.g., Kolender v. Lawson, 11 461 U.S. 352, 361 (1983) (“We conclude § 647(e) is unconstitutionally vague on its 12 face because it encourages arbitrary enforcement by failing to describe with sufficient 13 particularity what a suspect must do in order to satisfy the statute.”); Smith v. Goguen, 14 415 U.S. 566, 575, 581-82 (1974) (holding that a Massachusetts flag-misuse statute 15 was unconstitutionally vague because the legislature was fully capable of “defining 16 with substantial specificity what constitute[ed] forbidden treatment of United States 17 flags,” and “[s]tatutory language of such a standardless sweep allow[ed] policemen, 18 prosecutors, and juries to pursue their personal predilections”); Papachristou v. City of 19 Jacksonville, 405 U.S. 156, 170 (1972) (holding a vagrancy ordinance void for 20 vagueness and stating that “[w]here, as here, there are no standards governing the 21 exercise of the discretion granted by the ordinance, the scheme permits and encourages 22 an arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement of the law”).

23 Even if the DOJ’s own position were controlling – which of course it is not²⁵ – it 24 is not sufficiently clear to provide “fair warning.” First, in a document ostensibly

25 ²⁴ As discussed above, the Court can avoid invalidating the statute by rejecting the 26 Government’s overbroad definition and adopting Defendants’ definition, a 27 construction that raises no fair warning issues. See Section IV.5, supra. See 28 also United States v. Jin Fuey Moy, 241 U.S. 394, 401 (1916) (“A statute must be construed, if fairly possible, so as to avoid not only the conclusion that it is unconstitutional but also grave doubts upon that score.”).

1 created to provide guidance to laypersons, “The Lay-Person’s Guide [to the FCPA],” 2 which is available on the DOJ’s website, the DOJ offers a definition of “foreign 3 official” that provides no guidance for if or when the DOJ will consider an employee 4 of a state-owned enterprise to be a “foreign official”:

5 The prohibition extends only to corrupt payments to a foreign official, a 6 foreign political party or party official, or any candidate for foreign 7 political office. A ‘foreign official’ means any officer or employee of a 8 foreign government, a public international organization, or any 9 department or agency thereof, or any person acting in an official capacity.

10 Hanna Decl., Exh. R (Lay-Person’s Guide to FCPA), at §D, available at 11 <http://www.usdoj.gov/criminal/fraud/docs/dojdocb.html>). About employees of state-12 owned enterprises, the Guide says only, “You should consider utilizing the Department 13 of Justice’s Foreign Corrupt Practices Act Opinion Procedure for particular questions 14 as to the definition of a ‘foreign official,’ such as whether a member of a royal family, 15 a member of a legislative body, or an official of a state-owned business enterprise 16 would be considered a ‘foreign official.’”²⁵ Id. The United States Attorneys’ Manual, 17 a reference tool for federal prosecutors that provides official guidance on DOJ policies, 18 see United States v. Weyhrauch, 544 F.3d 969, 973 (9th Cir. 2008), describes the reach 19 of the FCPA in the same terms: “The [anti-bribery] prohibition extends only to corrupt

22 ²⁵ See, e.g., United States v. Bodmer, 342 F. Supp. 2d 176, 187 n.10 (S.D.N.Y.
 23 2004) (“The Government’s charging decision, standing alone, does not establish 24 the applicability of the statute.”). See also United States v. Welch, 327 F.3d 25 1081, 1092-93 (10th Cir. 2003) (“We ‘have never thought that the interpretation of those charged with prosecuting a criminal statute is entitled to deference.”) (citing Crandon v. United States, 494 U.S. 152, 177 (1990)).

26 ²⁶ The FCPA Opinion Procedure “enable[s] issuers and domestic concerns to 27 obtain an opinion of the Attorney General as to whether certain specified, 28 prospective – not hypothetical – conduct conforms with the Department’s present enforcement policy regarding the antibribery provisions of the [FCPA].”
 28 C.F.R. § 80.1.

1 payments made, directly or indirectly, to a foreign official, a foreign political party or 2 party official, or any candidate for foreign public office. A ‘foreign official’ means 3 any officer or employee of a foreign government, a public international organization, 4 or any department or agency thereof, or any person acting in an official capacity.” See 5 Hanna Decl., Exh. S (U.S. Dep’t of Justice, United States Attorneys’ Manual, tit. 9, 6 *Criminal Resources Manual 1018 (1997)).*²⁷

7 Second, as discussed above, in a submission to the OECD – available on the 8 DOJ website but not directed at laypersons – the Government raises the possibility of 9 its considering a state-owned business to be an “instrumentality” “in appropriate 10 circumstances,” but fails to spell out with any clarity what those circumstances are.²⁸ 11 See Hanna Decl., Exh. B. For these reasons, the OECD criticized the Government’s 12 position as creating “potential uncertainty.” Hanna Decl., Exh. G.

13 Third, to the extent the Government has provided some indication of the criteria 14 it apparently will consider in determining whether, in its view, a state-owned business 15 enterprise qualifies as a government “instrumentality” for purposes of the FCPA, it has 16 given mixed and conflicting signals. For example, at times the Government has stated 17 that it will consider the “local law” of the foreign state in determining instrumentality 18 status:

19 State-owned business enterprises may, in appropriate circumstances, be 20 considered instrumentalities of a foreign government and their officers

21 22 ²⁷ Another document available on the DOJ’s website, titled “Proposed Legislative 23 History, International Anti-Bribery Act of 1988,” states that “the FCPA 24 required both issuers and all other U.S. nationals and companies (defined as 25 domestic concerns’) to refrain from making any unlawful payments to public 26 officials, political parties, party officials, or candidates for public office” 27 Hanna Decl., Exh T (emphasis added).

28 ²⁸ Under the Government’s view, the onus to determine whether a foreign company constitutes a state-owned enterprise sufficient to render it an “instrumentality” is on the U.S. company doing business overseas. Without clear guidance from the Government as to what elevates a foreign commercial enterprise to “instrumentality” status, however, this is a difficult, if not impossible, task.

1 and employees to be foreign officials. The Department of Justice . . . has 2 not adopted a bright-line test for determining which enterprises are 3 instrumentalities. Among the factors that it considers are the foreign 4 state's own characterization of the enterprise and its employees, i.e., 5 whether it prohibits and prosecutes bribery of the enterprise's employees 6 as public corruption, the purpose of the enterprise, and the degree of 7 control exercised over the enterprise by the foreign government.

8 See Hanna Decl., Exh. B (U.S. Response to OECD Questions Concerning Phase I, at § 9 A.1.1); see also Hanna Decl., Exh. U (FCPA Opinion Procedure Release No. 10-03) 10 (concluding that a consultant that was a "registered agent of a foreign government" did 11 not qualify as a "foreign official" under the disclosed facts and relying in part on local 12 law to reach this conclusion; "As a matter of law local, the Consultant and its 13 employees are not employees or otherwise officials of the foreign government, and the 14 Requestor has secured a local law opinion that it is permissible for the Consultant to 15 represent both the foreign government and the Requestor at the same time."). At other 16 times, however, the Government has indicated that it will consider employees of state-17 owned enterprises to be "foreign officials" even where under the local law such 18 persons were not considered government employees. See, e.g., Hanna Decl., Exh. V 19 (FCPA Opinion Procedure Release No. 94-01) ("The American company's foreign 20 attorney has advised that under the nation's law, the individual would not be regarded 21 as either a government employee or a public official, the foreign attorney's opinion is 22 not dispositive, and we have considered the foreign individual to be a 'foreign official' 23 under the statute.").

24 In addition to the OECD, many commentators have noted the vagueness of the 25 "foreign official" definition in particular, as well as the vagueness of the FCPA 26 generally. See Ron Johnstone, Corporate Counsel: The Top 10 Compliance Tips For 27 The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, 71 Tex. B. J. 642 (2008) ("Setting aside the clear-28 cut cases (e.g., foreign government legislators, ministers, and employees), the FCPA's

1 foreign official definition . . . is quite vague. Such vagueness has the dual effect of 1) 2 giving the DOJ and SEC plenty of enforcement discretion/wiggle room, and 2) making 3 it difficult for U.S. companies to provide their employees with clear guidance, 4 particularly when doing business in countries where the line between business and 5 industry is blurred (e.g., China.)” (emphasis added); James R. Doty, Toward a Reg.
6 FCPA: A Modest Proposal for Change in Administering the Foreign Corrupt Practices
7 Act, 62 BUS. LAW. 1233, 1238-39 (2007) (“Vagueness and ambiguity are the DNA of 8 the FCPA,” which “on its face is purposefully – and for companies seeking to comply, 9 often maddeningly – short on specifics.”); Christopher J. Duncan, The 1998 Foreign 10 Corrupt Practices Act Amendments: Moral Empiricism or Moral Imperialism?, 1 11 Asian-Pacific L. & Pol’y J. 14 (2000) (noting that the FCPA contains “rather vague 12 standards.”); David A. Gantz, The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act: Professional and 13 Ethical Challenges for Lawyers, 14 Ariz. J. Int’l & Comp. L. 97, 111-15 (1997) 14 (presenting hypothetical situations arising under the FCPA that highlight “gray areas” 15 in the statute).

16 Such criticisms have been made since at least March 1981, when the 17 “investigative arm” of Congress, the Government Accountability Office (“GAO”) 18 released a report titled “Impact of Foreign Corrupt Practices Act on U.S. Business.” 19 Among other things, the report noted that there was “confusion over what constitutes 20 compliance with the act’s antibribery provisions,” and that “corporate and 21 governmental officials have criticized the anti-bribery provisions as being ambiguous 22 about what constitutes compliance.” Hanna Decl., Exh. W at 37-38. The ambiguities 23 included confusion or uncertainty about several issues, including the “definition of 24 ‘foreign official.’” Id. at 38-40. The report observed that “[t]his definition has been 25 criticized as unclear. Lawyers we contacted questioned whether employees of public 26 corporations, such as national airlines or nationalized companies, are considered 27 foreign officials. Similar questions have surfaced in countries – particularly 28 developing countries – where there are small and frequently closely related groups,

1 including both business and government relationships as well as families. Individuals 2 within these groups frequently move between the private and public sectors, often 3 without a clear distinction.” Id. at 40. See also Hanna Decl., Exh. X (Christopher 4 Byron, Big Profits in Big Bribery, TIME, Mar. 16, 1981) (“Last week’s GAO study, 5 however, makes plain that the current American [FCPA] law is riddled with 6 complicating ambiguities and shortcomings.”); Exh. Y (Business: The Trade Parade
7 Grows Longer, TIME, Oct. 13, 1980) (“Last month the Carter Administration sent a 8 hefty 250-page report to Congress on the various ways the U.S. discourages exporters.
9 One example: the provisions of the 1977 Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, which have 10 never been clearly spelled out by the Justice Department.”).

11 Recently, the U.S. Chamber Institute for Legal Reform, an affiliate of the U.S.
12 Chamber of Commerce, released a paper, entitled “Restoring Balance: Proposed 13 Amendments to the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act,” in which it chronicled the 14 vagueness of the term “instrumentality” as employed by the Government and declared 15 that “[t]he government’s approach to what companies qualify as ‘instrumentalities’ of 16 foreign governments is detrimental to American business interests. Without a clear 17 understanding of what companies are considered ‘instrumentalities,’ companies have 18 no way of knowing whether the FCPA applies to a particular transaction or business 19 relationship, particularly in countries like China where most if not all companies are 20 either partially or entirely owned or controlled by the state.” Hanna Decl., Exh. Z at 21 27. “For this reason,” the paper stated, “the FCPA should be modified to include a 22 clear definition of ‘instrumentality.’” Id.

23 Indeed, even former FCPA prosecutors have acknowledged the vagueness of the 24 FCPA’s definition of “foreign official.” For example, Martin Weinstein, the lead 25 prosecutor in the 1990s Lockheed case (one of the first major corporate prosecutions 26 brought under the FCPA, which resulted in a criminal fine and civil settlement totaling 27 $24.8 million, making it the most expensive international corruption case at that time) 28 was recently asked if the FCPA was “in need of further amendment,” and “[i]f so, what

1 would the ‘Weinstein’ amendment look like?’ Hanna Decl., ¶ AA. Mr. Weinstein 2 responded:

3 I think the Weinstein amendment would focus on the very significant 4 issue of who is a foreign official and what constitutes a state-controlled 5 instrumentality. There is so little guidance in this area that an amendment 6 to the law providing clarity to companies wishing to comply is really 7 essential. For example, after the U.K. government takeovers of certain 8 British banks and U.S. intervention in the auto industry, did all these 9 private businesses become state-controlled instrumentalities rendering all 10 their employees government officials? Companies should not have to 11 guess who is and who is not a government official.

12 Id.

13 The inevitable guesswork that is required by the Government’s proposed 14 interpretation renders the statute unconstitutionally vague as applied to Defendants if 15 adopted by this Court. As Justice Scalia noted in his concurring opinion in Skilling, 16 “[a] criminal statute must clearly define the conduct it proscribes,” and a “statute that 17 is unconstitutionally vague cannot be saved by a . . . judicial construction that writes in 18 specific criteria that its text does not contain.” Skilling, 130 S. Ct. at 2935 (Scalia, J., 19 concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (citations omitted); cf. United 20 States v. Goyal, No. 08-10436, 2010 U.S. App. LEXIS 25223, at *28-*29 (Dec. 10, 21 2010 9th Cir.) (Kozinski, C.J., concurring) (“This is just one of a string of recent cases 22 in which courts have found that federal prosecutors overreached by trying to stretch 23 criminal law beyond its proper bounds. . . . This is not the way criminal law is 24 supposed to work. Civil law often covers conduct that falls in a gray area of arguable 25 legality. But criminal law should clearly separate conduct that is criminal from 26 conduct that is legal. . . . When prosecutors have to stretch the law or the evidence to 27 secure a conviction . . . it can hardly be said that [the] moral judgment [of society 28

1 regarding the defendants' behavior] is warranted. . . . [P]erhaps . . . the government 2 will be more cautious in the future.”).

3 If the Court adopts the Government's interpretation of the term 4 “instrumentality,” the FCPA will be rendered void for vagueness as applied to 5 Defendants. Simply stated, to the extent that the FCPA is construed to proscribe 6 payments made or promised to employees of state-owned companies, it is 7 constitutionally beyond salvation.

8 V. CONCLUSION

9 If the Government wants to prosecute individuals under the FCPA for allegedly 10 bribing employees of state-owned enterprises, it should lobby Congress to amend the 11 statute. Under the current statute, the Government's position is without support and 12 should be rejected by the Court. Accordingly, and for the reasons set forth above, 13 Defendants respectfully request that the Court enter an order pursuant to Fed. R. Crim.
14 P. 12(b) dismissing Counts One through Ten of the Indictment.
